Question ⊙

Suppose you and your team have been working on a high priority task that must be done efficiently and effectively. It is vital that this task is done with the utmost accuracy, but one of the members of your team has made a mistake on it and has based the rest of the project on it. How would you address this mistake/prevent future mistakes like this?
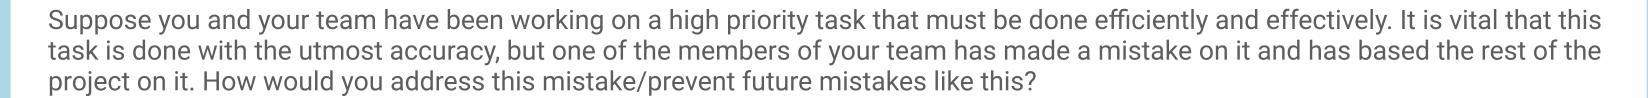

Select Quality

○ You work with your team to fix the mistake and then decide to delegate certain parts of the task/go through checkpoints with your team to prevent the mistake from happening again.

○ You show the mistake to your team and encourage them to work on it together to solve it. Afterwards, you ask your team how you could've been more helpful and could've provided more support to them. You are adaptive to any type of manage style they propose to help them work better.

○ You go through the mistake with your team to help them understand/reflect on why it happened to prevent it from happening in the future. Each team member is required to understand all of the aspects of the problem and solution so they are all equipped to catch any mistakes in the future.
